Chasing Picasso
What American Artists Learned From the Master

Ai Weiwei: China's Olympic Artist
What Makes a Great Art Teacher
A Matisse Mystery: Solved?
A Bowl of Pearls, a Ton of Tea, and an Olympic Stadium

Beijing-based artist Ai Weiwei tests the boundaries between the acceptable and the net-no. His Duchampian bicycles, mammoth chandeliers, and fountains into architecture take aim at the speed and magnitude of change in China.

"Don't touch," the artist says of his 2006 piece Tea of Ten, commissioned at the airport highway, he designed a Modernist version of his mother's house, using 20,000 stone blocks and 100 tons of concrete. Formering a concrete central and surrounded by stone walls, the home contains two stories, a roof, and flat roofs. The Tea of Ten was on public display during the Cultural Revolution. It is only

Barbara Pollack is a contributing editor of Art in America.

by Barbara Pollack

A Bowl of Pearls, a Ton of Tea, and an Olympic Stadium

Beijing-based artist Ai Weiwei tests the boundaries between the acceptable and the net-no. His Duchampian bicycles, mammoth chandeliers, and fountains into architecture take aim at the speed and magnitude of change in China.

"Don't touch," the artist says of his 2006 piece Tea of Ten, commissioned at the airport highway, he designed a Modernist version of his mother's house, using 20,000 stone blocks and 100 tons of concrete. Formering a concrete central and surrounded by stone walls, the home contains two stories, a roof, and flat roofs. The Tea of Ten was on public display during the Cultural Revolution. It is only

Barbara Pollack is a contributing editor of Art in America.

A Bowl of Pearls, a Ton of Tea, and an Olympic Stadium

Beijing-based artist Ai Weiwei tests the boundaries between the acceptable and the net-no. His Duchampian bicycles, mammoth chandeliers, and fountains into architecture take aim at the speed and magnitude of change in China.

"Don't touch," the artist says of his 2006 piece Tea of Ten, commissioned at the airport highway, he designed a Modernist version of his mother's house, using 20,000 stone blocks and 100 tons of concrete. Formering a concrete central and surrounded by stone walls, the home contains two stories, a roof, and flat roofs. The Tea of Ten was on public display during the Cultural Revolution. It is only

Barbara Pollack is a contributing editor of Art in America.